This townhome-style 1 bedroom + den, 2 bathroom home hits a tone that's hard to find—warm, inviting, and genuinely comfortable to live in—within a building designed by award-winning architect Jeremy Sturgess. The two-level layout creates real separation: the main floor is designed for living and the upper level feels like a true retreat. The living space is the standout—ceilings with exposed beams, a wall of windows, and soft natural light that carries through the day. The flow here is easy and natural, with the living area opening seamlessly around a custom-built wall unit featuring integrated wine storage and cubbies, creating a space that feels both functional and grounded. The kitchen has been thoughtfully updated and flows naturally into the living area, making the space feel connected without being crowded. A full bathroom and in-suite laundry on the main level add to the overall function. Upstairs, the primary bedroom is quiet and removed, with skylights, a private balcony, and open mountain views. It's a calm, comfortable space that feels separate from the rest of the home. A second full bathroom completes this level. The den offers flexibility depending on how you want to use the space—guests, office, or a second sleeping area. Well maintained, carefully updated, and filled with natural light, this home also features custom-made window coverings throughout, adding to the overall sense of quality and cohesion. The covered parking stall includes the ability to accommodate a storage unit, adding practical flexibility. Add in the views and the location, and it becomes a really compelling option in a part of Banff where opportunities like this don't come up often.
